CHARLES LINDBERGH AND HIS STRANGE FINAL ARRANGEMENTS

by Noel Allard

Of course there is almost no one who hasn't heard the name of Charles Lindbergh and know about his solo Atlantic crossing in 1927. He became the most famous person in the world after the feat and is still remembered in every corner of the globe.

Fewer remember that he was a pacifist leading up to WWII and made the US government leaders angry with his rhetoric. He also appeared to be anti-semitic. Fewer even know that after America's entry into WWII, Lindbergh flew many missions in the South Pacific and instructed fighter pilots on getting the most out of their P-38 aircraft.

Never-the-less, his aviation accomplishments made him a God. Certainly, one would think that his final resting place would be a magnificent monument, and his marker, a fitting tribute to his aerial spirit. Might his memory not have been marked with a large granite stone and a bronze plaque. Speed Holman, for example, barnstormer, stunt pilot and airline pioneer, is buried at the height of land across the river from the Minneapolis Airport with a unique visible bronze marker, and a huge stone monument in St. Paul acknowledges that "He belonged to the heights – and the heights claimed him!" Surely, we would have expected Lindbergh to have been cremated and his ashes spread from the air over his hometown, Little Falls, MN, or over the Atlantic Ocean, or some other ethereal high place reserved for the world's greatest aviators.

Lindbergh would have none of that. His resting place and marker were planned by himself with the intention that he not be (Continued on page 2)

by Dennis Strand

Well, we are off to a good start with the club's membership drive. We had 15 people pay dues for 2024 at the September meeting. This gave us a $225.00 income. There were no recent expenses. Our Bank account stands at $5501.36. Let's keep this going. You can catch me at a meeting or send $15.00 to:

Dennis Strand, 833 Manomin Ave., St. Paul. MN 55107.

Club dues and our annual auction are TCAH's only sources of income. So, it is important that everyone signs up. The earlier, the better. The goal is to get all current members listed by December 31 so that we can get a current and accurate roster printed in a timely manner.

bothered or in any way honored after his death. In Reeve Lindbergh's book, No More Words, a book she wrote about the last days of her mother. Ann Morrow Lindbergh, Charles Lindbergh's wife. Reeve relates: "During his final ten days in Maui, he consulted with the gravedigger, requesting that certain hymns be sung at his funeral and asked that specific items be placed with him in his coffin..." His body "...was buried in a grave eight feet square and twelve feet deep, according to Hawaiian tradition, with layer after layer of lava rocks around and above him. The farm boy from Minnesota who had flown the Atlantic Ocean was tucked inside a cliff overlooking the

Anne Morrow, Lindbergh's wife, debated with her daughter Reeve, prior to Ann's death as to what to do with her cremated ashes. Should she have some of herself scattered over her husband's grave in Maui? It seemed only fitting, after fortyfive years together, that she be represented in his final resting place, but she certainly didn't want to dig up all those heavy rocks and have herself sunk down inside the grave with him in another heavy coffin. "It might disturb his peace."

Lindbergh's life is very well detailed in Scott Berg's biography of him. Lindy was a loner from his earliest days. His firstborn son was kidnapped and murdered. That may have played a role, a PTSD role in his entire remaining life that left him only tolerant of other people, unable to really bond with his family, spending as much time away from them as he could, retiring to Hawaii to work by himself in a medical lab, and having himself buried apart from the public, in a simple inaccessible place, deep in the earth under rocks that man would not pull asunder, or conveniently gather to honor his spirit.
